and it will not be garbled. As you can see, this is called the output key of the server. The command now is a bit more than we originally thought: POST / HTTP/1.1 Host: 127.0.0.1:8089 Content-Type: application/x-www-form-urlencoded Content-Length: 356 Accept: text/plain Connection: close i=1&j=1 =1 This is the complete request we sent to the server, however, we have yet to execute this, but we will do that after we post the form which will be the next code. There is a GET variable in this page, called i, that has a value of 1. It basically says we have a form that allows us to select from a list. There are no limitations on how many there are, but there are two columns (i and j) and there are four rows of data in total. So when we post to this page, i=1. Then there is a section where the user is supposed to enter a value in the form, this is assigned to the variable j. The pattern is i=1&j=1&...=4&....&n=1 where n is the number of entries you enter, meaning we have 4 entries to enter, each separated by &. When you do this, you will notice that the value of the i variable gets incremented by one every time you click that button. The j variable stays the same value every time you click. In the end, you will receive a request with post parameters i=4&j=4. The reason that I have the data as a form instead of just posting it normally to a URL is that I can use cURL to automate this whole process. cURL is a command line tool that lets you send HTTP requests to a server. To execute the cURL command, enter: curl -v cURL is a really powerful command line tool and you can find it here: That should give you a clear picture. Coming off the devastating loss to the Montreal Canadiens, the Toronto Maple Leafs returned home to an even more dire situation. Toronto's defence, one of the Leafs worst units, gave up two goals

In this known electro-optical system the diode component is secured to the housing in a manner that allows it to rotate about a horizontal axis coinciding with the light beam axis. This provides the effect that the diode of the component or parts of the diode can be tipped for the purpose of adjusting the light beam angle. The diode can, for example, be tipped by means of a screw thread, which displaces it through a distance corresponding to one eigth of a light beam. Other means for modifying the beam orientation can also be applied. It is a disadvantage of this known electro-optical system that the adjusting of the light beam axis does not permit close matching of 570a42141b
