A former Catholic nun who helped expose clergy abuse is being honoured in Parliament on the same day her native Ireland is facing the prospect of losing the Eurovision Song Contest due to a controversy that has overshadowed the show for days. Northern Ireland's objections to the "entertainment" of marriage equality may be rejected by other European countries that want to take part in the show later this year. In a move that could have implications for Irish viewers, the European Broadcasting Union announced on Friday that Germany, Austria, France and Spain would contest the 2020 Eurovision Song Contest in Tel Aviv, Israel. Prime Minister Leo Varadkar will hold talks in Israel later this week to discuss the move, which is designed to give an additional German broadcaster more exposure and boost the country's tourism industry. "I'm optimistic about the talks and that the majority of European countries and the Irish Government will realise that this is a vote of confidence in the Irish economy." That sentiment was echoed by RTÉ Radio One's Aine Lawlor, who works at the European Broadcasting Union and was among the members of the panel that recommended Germany's bid. "In the history of Eurovision, there has never been a clear winner. And whether it's Germany or Spain, Ireland or Sweden, it will be a really exciting time to watch," she said. While Ireland currently has no representative
