Developer: HideWin is made by Smith Shy, This app was published by Smith Shy Window management might seem like an easy task, but if multiple ones forcefully integrate themselves it quickly becomes a pain. Some can't even be minimized, or stay on top of everything else until a specific task is done. In this regard, HideWin comes with the means to hide them from plain sight, without affecting functionality. Advantages of a portable app Just to provide the flexibility you need, the application skips you the effort of going through a setup process, and can thus be used on other computers besides your own directly from a thumb drive. Moreover, runtime does not affect registry entries, so you don't have to worry about affecting the stability of the target PC. The main window can seem a little confusing at first, especially because there's no list of active windows. However, the application includes an incredibly useful component, namely a separate list of active windows. It comes in handy because adding targets isn't done by dropping a crosshair over the target window, but rather writing details like title and class, which can be tricky to get just right. Set items to automatically hide The target window doesn't immediately hide, so you manually have to start the process when done. These are not sent to the taskbar, or the tray area, but taken away completely from the screen. You can only bring them back by stopping the hide process. All

HideWin Crack+ [March-2022]

A simple utility for reducing mouse clicks The main idea behind the key-macro function is simple. Once you enter a key combination, all subsequent mouse clicks will be automatically registered as a click with a specified behavior. This can be as precise as a single click, or as simple as a double click. The first thing you need to do is to specify the command to send for the specified behavior. The single click is the default behavior, and happens with single mouse clicks only. This means you don't have to enter a key when you want to click, and you can still see where you clicked. The second option means that it's done with every single mouse click. There are three ways you can control this behavior. You can press the key, again, or even a third time to cancel the command. If the last behavior is selected, then every subsequent click will do nothing until you click again. There's also the possibility of specifying multiple commands that will be executed when a key is pressed. The actual commands can be up to 30 characters long, so the possibilities are endless. This means you can register up to 30 different actions with one key. The third option is to specify a range of values, and the program will check the value of the mouse pointer at a particular point. The pointer value is the lowest value that will trigger the command, so you can specify to have a command executed if the mouse cursor is anywhere within the specified range. The maximum number of macro commands that can be stored with a key is 30, so the possibilities are virtually unlimited. Moreover, the value of each command can be up to 30 characters long, so you can do some interesting things in a limited number of clicks. Users can also specify minimum and maximum delays between key presses. If they don't, the mouse pointer will change instantly, but you'll have to wait at least a minimum number of seconds before the next click can be registered. If you can't think of any command, or the range of values that would make sense, the program includes a database with more than a few thousand keys and values, which you can use to find one to suit your purposes. The database can be changed in the options if you want to add new entries or alter existing ones. The most valuable feature of this utility, though, is undoubtedly its extremely small size. Just a single file, you can't get more lightweight. Add a new key 77a5ca646e
