Q: Is it ok to use a single instance of an object outside the class? I have an object that I need to use throughout the program, but I dont want it to be created each time I launch the program. I've tried implementing static, but it doesnt work as expected. So, I assume its ok to declare it outside of the class definition: public struct ViewObject { public int OffsetX; public int OffsetY; public ViewObject(int x, int y) { OffsetX = x; OffsetY = y; } } I then created this test class to see if i can access the object outside of the class: public class TestClass { static ViewObject obj; public static void Main() { Console.WriteLine(obj.OffsetX); } } Is this a valid way to implement the idea of static or am I doing something wrong? I also tried using public, but it gave me an error that the ViewObject does not exist in current context. A: If you want to access it from within the class, you could use: public class ViewObject { public static ViewObject Obj = new ViewObject(); public int OffsetX { get; set; } public int OffsetY { get; set; } public ViewObject() { } } This will create a "singleton" object and return it each time you call it. A more "right-way" example is: public class ViewObject { private static ViewObject obj; public static ViewObject GetInstance() { if(obj == null) { obj = new ViewObject(); } return obj; } public int OffsetX { get; set; }

Tell the truth, though, and most people outside the world of professional wrestling would be surprised to hear that (as the wrestlers put it) the "women's revolution" is really only about increasing the number of women who appear on a regular basis. They're talented and skilled at this stuff, just like the men, and they've proven this time and time again. But that doesn't mean women are going to be getting the same treatment by the WWE, which has become a male-focused enterprise and which still has a long way to go to acknowledge all women on equal footing. Even in the 1990's, when women did have a stronger footing in the WWE, few were willing to acknowledge the genre's real strength – which is in the "women's wrestling" put together by women for women. Part of the cause of this is the TV ratings, which were going down in the 1990's and haven't gotten any better in the years since. In 2001, WWE featured only 11 matches with women on television. In 2011, they were on the air 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. They've been ramping up the number of women on their shows and in their magazines ever since, but that influx of talent didn't translate to new TV ratings. They're going to keep trying, but the efforts aren't going to change things overnight. Not that there's any reason for them to be any different – the men all want to make money, just like the women. It's not like the women get more money for working in the ring, and they're not the primary breadwinners for the company. They're also not getting the same perks or the same protection. The point is, there's really no reason that women should have an easier time making a living in the wrestling industry than men, or an easier time advancing their careers. Women are on a similar level with men in the industry, not behind them. We're still a long way off from the day when WWE features as many women on TV as they do men. But when that day comes, fans will be clamoring for more episodes with the new crop of talented women they're adding to their shows all the time.--- name: Feature request about: Suggest an idea
