The multiple roles of the glutathione S-transferases: implications in prostate cancer. A multitude of characteristics and markers in human tumors have been exploited to define the genetic profile of a cancer and to predict its clinical behavior and its response to treatment. A number of these markers may be used in prostate cancer. In its initial stage, the disease is amenable to radical treatments that are associated with poor cancer control. Currently, the mainstay of therapy of localized disease is prostatectomy, irradiation and androgen deprivation. However, only a subset of patients with clinically detectable cancers have a tumor that is sensitive to these treatments and only a few of them are cured. Furthermore, a negative prognostic power of the androgen receptor (AR) protein and its gene amplification has been described in prostate cancer. The goals of this review are to highlight the biochemical functions of the three human glutathione S-transferases (GSTs) and their physiological significance in human tissues. A particular emphasis will be devoted to the diverse roles of GST pi in the prostatic microenvironment with emphasis on their role in cell proliferation, growth, differentiation and apoptosis. Finally, the role of GST pi and other members of the glutathione S-transferase family as therapeutic targets will be discussed. Wednesday, April 8, 2008 Today, I attended the first day of my Industrial Design course. We got to do a short workshop about "materials", which were used for all practical and theoretical design. We looked at some basic terms and their different characteristics. There were of course also some practical tutorials. I am so happy to be in this course, and I have learnt so much already. I was wondering about the difference between our lectures and our practical sessions, but now I realize that the practical sessions are the more important as they let you practise and enhance your previous knowledge. We have seen first hand that a well-prepared mind is a powerful thing, and I believe it is a very big strength in a design student to be prepared for each situation, also in a class. I look forward to meeting my new friends and 648931e174

Although the relationship between phospholipase A2 (PLA2) activity and diacylglycerol formation has been well documented, the possibility that PLA2(s) may occur in the intact heart has not been previously investigated. We measured PLA2 activity in human myocardial extracts, and we found measurable activity with the following properties: protein concentration independence, inhibition by the PLA2 inhibitor phenylmethylsulfonyl fluoride (PMSF), inhibition of both calcium-dependent and calcium-independent PLA2 activity, and stimulation of phosphatidate formation. Our data demonstrate for the first time the occurrence of a specific type of PLA2 in human heart tissue.Indo-Gangetic Border The Indo-Gangetic Border (;) is one of the four divisions of the India-Bangladesh border, the other three being: the Southern border, the Northeast border and the West Bengal border.
