The effect of aldosterone on growth of a human renal cell carcinoma (RCC) was studied in athymic mice. Mice implanted with small cells derived from the same patient as the patient's original tumor showed an increase in the initial tumor size over the first week but then stable growth for at least 40 days, whereas mice implanted with large cells showed a steady decrease in tumor volume. Each tumor was implanted into the flank of a single mouse. This study demonstrates that growth of human RCC is dependent upon the size of the tumor and the hormone used to regulate tumor growth. In the field of computer science, a computer is called a general-purpose computer if it can be used for a wide variety of jobs. It is called a special-purpose computer if it is designed to meet a specific set of needs. However, the market for special-purpose computers is very limited because the overall cost of a special-purpose computer is too high for most businesses and individuals. Accordingly, most of the personal computers currently in use are general-purpose computers. For example, a personal computer designed to perform word processing and to play PC games has a powerful processor and a large mass storage disk drive. While the user may be asked to make periodic purchases of new disk storage media, the processor speed and memory capacity are expected to remain high indefinitely. Because of the limited market for special-purpose computers, much of the design work involved in creating a special-purpose computer is used to adapt a general-purpose computer to a specific task. Consequently, most personal computers are combination computers, in which the user must make periodic purchases of new hardware for the general-purpose computer to perform the specific task. For example, a word processing system and a personal-computer game system are combined to make a useful word processing and game machine. Similarly, a computer sound recording system is combined with a personal computer with a built-in microprocessor to make a musical instrument and recording system.
