Should I do research and if I do, where As a 22-year old female who is about to start my third year of college, I have a couple of questions regarding whether or not I should research and where I should begin researching. First, as you can guess I am not a science major. What I wanted to know is if I wanted to do anything with learning, science, research or anything like that where the information I obtain would be based more on fact/factual or just fiction. For example, is it worth it to try to observe for myself the little fights, fights that I have seen my dogs have with each other. They will fight their hearts out and the other day it seemed like Kano was not going to win the fight and then pulled out a blade of some kind. We have never had anything like that happen before and so I was thinking that maybe I should do research in the fight field. Then second, I have two questions about the history of America... You should do things that interest you. For example, I love the history of America and find it fascinating. So I made a career of history, and don't regret it. I love learning what happens, when it happens, and who happens to be doing it, and it is always so interesting. Even though I'm not on the history track, I've researched a lot. When I'm taught something about American history, I want to verify it with as much information as possible. There will always be some gaps in history where we get conflicting accounts, but, in the end, we all agree about the most important events. I believe in the word of God, and I also try to be as informed as possible. If you are not a science person in general, keep it that way. You don't have to be trained to do research, and you don't have to be a scientist to start research. You can start with the New Testament, or any other book that you know really well. For example, I have read and studied the new testament for over 40 years, and I'm just starting to teach it to my children (2nd grade). I don't plan on changing it, but it started the research. I also have done research in astronomy, which is another subject that I am not formally trained in (But I have a family member who is an astronomer, and his family's home is a planetarium, which is awesome). Usually, especially for the younger people

No need to cut and redo your bra straps I love a good bra and have tried out a few in the past. I also own a fit and flare under bust bra. Its comfortable and soft. However, I was recently told by a bra fitter I would look better if I cut and redo my under-bust straps. Not only is it a pain to have to go back and forth to the changing room to cut them and redo them, but also my bras are also too big and not pulling me in enough. Im not sure if this is something I can do as I would like to upgrade my under-bust bra and may need help. Any suggestions?Microbial reduction and binding of cadmium in a forest soil (a pilot study). Phytoremediation of cadmium-contaminated soils is a promising alternative to phytoextraction. It has been suggested that microbes play a central role in the reduction and immobilisation of cadmium, especially in the rhizosphere. The aim of the present study was to examine the potential of a forest soil to immobilise cadmium by reduction and binding by microbial cells. The soil samples were collected from a forest area contaminated with a zinc-Cd-Zn ore deposit. Cadmium speciation was performed in the fractions of 0.1-10, 10-50 and >50kD of soil size fractions, which were obtained by 0.1M NaNO(3) extraction, and then the cadmium binding fractions were isolated by cation exchange chromatography. Both the labile (residual) and the stable (exchangeable and carbonate bound) cadmium were collected. The immobilisation capacities of the fractions of the labile cadmium, the stable cadmium and the cadmium binding fractions were then determined by a bio-sequential extraction procedure. Cadmium reduction was found to occur mainly in the bioreduced fraction of 0.1-10kD of soil. Cadmium was mostly bound to organic matter in the fractions
