For an organisation that can afford to purchase the CC product, but does not need to distribute it, the question arises as to whether it is really a cost-effective product. (1:14) The San Francisco 49ers have been awarded the "Don't Call Us" award for the second consecutive season. PFT offered the award to the team that goes into the playoffs being linked by the media to a hot new nickname, a nomenclature that doesn't go over well in the teams' communities. In 2013, the trophy was given to the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. The award is voted on by the 12-member Pro Football Talk editorial board. For the past two years, PFT has announced the nominees for the award on the morning of Wild Card Weekend, with the winners revealed live during the NFL Network's telecast. This year, the award has a nationwide contest on Twitter, with votes being submitted via the social network. In addition to the Buccaneers and 49ers, the only other team that received votes for the award this year was the Kansas City Chiefs. The Chiefs and two other teams -- the Dallas Cowboys and Philadelphia Eagles -- were the winners in 2012. The Buccaneers were a popular pick for the award in 2013 -- including for our own Steve Wyche -- but ultimately came up short. Tampa Bay was mentioned by the media many times throughout the year and then near the end of the season when the team was 0-4 and the community rejected the "Lovie Bowl" nickname associated with the team. In the end, it was the Houston Texans who got the "Don't Call Us" award last season. The 49ers have been mentioned by the media throughout the season, and the team has been open about the fact that some fans dislike the nickname being attached to the team. San Francisco was believed to be a favorite to win the award until Kansas City won last season. In the aftermath of the 49ers' wild-card loss to Green Bay, coach Jim Tomsula has said he was aware of the perception of the team by some fans. He has also said he was aware of his team's nickname, and the team asked for the award to be given to them. "That's the reason we feel

I'm interested in the format game-in-a-day. Are there any drawbacks to playtesting your game with your friends, as opposed to in solo play? A: In my experience there were no drawbacks to playtesting with friends, but like all things you should do good research and don't be afraid to try things out. The benefit of playtesting with friends is you can catch things that come up while you're actually playtesting that you may not have seen otherwise, and it's more possible to get instant feedback on things. With something like game-in-a-day, I think the way to keep people from getting completely burnt out is to have them commit to only one entry a day, and only play it for a certain amount of time. When it comes to playtesting in general, I would say do your best to see it as a means to test things out and have fun, but it is up to you to make sure you have fun, and if something is particularly difficult for you to test, then maybe do it in solo play as well and see how it goes. A: It depends on how you set up the test. If you make the test a structured interview, like a take-home exam, then of course you are going to have problems. If you design it to be more like a free-form conversation between you and your friends, then you can really mess up a test if you don't understand the goal. But if you don't write a test that has a goal and you just try to have fun, then of course you're going to have problems. A: In my experience the biggest downside is that one of the players will likely be less experienced (or not interested) than the other. It's pretty easy to form a negative impression of a game, especially when you're the one that's giving it a whirl,
