The most downloaded items in the PC Windows category.Snowball Earth The Earth's atmosphere once trapped huge amounts of carbon dioxide (CO2) deep underground, which helped produce the so-called "Snowball Earth," a world covered in snowstorms, where all sea life was wiped out by mass carbon-dioxide and oxygen burial. After these two substances were released to the surface by volcanic activity, the oceans turned acidic. One of the first researchers to study this hypothesis was Berner in 1906. He calculated that ocean sinking could not sink CO2 fast enough to counteract the 10-15 gigatonnes of additional CO2 present in the atmosphere. It seemed that a snowball Earth was inevitable. However, he was later told that a greenhouse effect was more likely. Therefore, the snowball theory was declared dead. But in 2007, Berner and Butterfield showed that fossil records of ice-cores and sedimentary rocks buried in marine sediments could be used to measure the atmospheric CO2 concentration at the time they formed. By calculating how much carbon has been removed from the ocean since then, along with a number of other variables, they could
