Molecular surface analysis of arachidonic acid interactions with a lipid bilayer. We have utilized Monte Carlo (MC) simulations to study in detail the structure of the molecular interface formed by arachidonic acid (AA) between a phospholipid bilayer and water. Two hundred independent calculations were performed on a rigid bilayer model. The simulations demonstrate that AA binds strongly to the surface of the polar headgroup region of the bilayer. However, it fails to penetrate deeply into the hydrophobic region due to strong repulsive interactions between the AA carbon atoms and the bilayer interior. The carboxyl group of AA makes electrostatic interactions with the negatively charged moieties of the phospholipid headgroups. Since the area per AA molecule in the bilayer is nearly three times that calculated for an isolated AA molecule in water, the entropy factor is expected to significantly decrease the energy of binding compared with water, in agreement with experiment.
