The peacock is one of the very rare birds, and only around 20% of the world's peacock population has a tail color like what you see in the image above. The reason for this has to do with the wonderful breeding and natural genetics of the peacock. This is a spot you don't want to be in when a peacock is out and about, even if it is just an outline on the ground, even though it's an outline it will grow into a full grown peacock with many colorful feathers if given enough time to grow. The reason for this is because there are a limited amount of genes that are controlled by the peacock's body, and the number of genes it has are more than what the body can naturally produce. The peacock must eventually turn the genes off when it doesn't want to produce them, and this is why only around 20% of peacock populations are able to turn off the genes and produce the pure green color in their tail feathers. The whole coloring process begins when the male peacock picks out a male he will mate with, and this isn't always the easiest thing to do because he's so beautiful and it seems like that the female's will all be interested in him, which is why he really has to work hard at picking the right one to mate with. When he picks the right one, he will start to tell her all the things he sees in her that he likes and all the things she does that he doesn't like. This way she will know if she has the right guy, and if she has the wrong guy she will know that too. The way it works is that the male peacock takes in the information that the female is giving him, and then he has f988f36e3a
