This help you create excellent cross-platform PDF solutions for Windows and Linux. The project provides a solution for editing and creating PDFs with different features and functions such as encryption, batch processing, editing of properties and so on. the richness of their humanized tissues, but they also present limitations: the biocompatibility of the scaffold might be poor in some cases (large number of donors, for instance), the fast degradation is not always ideal and they are not easily produced in large quantities. The alternative strategy is to use additive manufacturing (AM), which is based on the fusion of molecules in a liquid state to form a solid in a layer by layer manner. AM has been successfully used in the design of various biomaterials \[[@B116-materials-13-01905]\], due to the possibility to create complex functional structures with accurate geometries and final scaffolds with higher porosity than conventional scaffolds. The main advantage of using AM to develop 3D scaffolds for bone tissue engineering is the ability to fabricate scaffolds with micro-/nano-size pores \[[@B117-materials-13-01905]\]. This feature is extremely important for promoting cell colonization and bone regeneration due to the fact that the scaffold micro-/nano-structure favors cell adhesion, migration, and proliferation, thus promoting the 3D growth of bone tissue \[[@B118-materials-13-01905]\]. Moreover, the possibility of fabricating scaffolds with complex shapes and geometries allows the customization of the scaffold for specific tissue regeneration and clinical treatments \[[@B119-materials-13-01905]\]. For example, it has been shown that the osteogenesis in the mouse mesenchymal stem cells in vitro was accelerated using the scaffolds with micro-/nano-structure in comparison to the scaffolds with larger pore size \[[@B120-materials-13-01905]\]. AM is still an emerging technology and its widespread adoption as an alternative to the traditional techniques (sintering, casting, or machining) is, however, still in its early stages. Further developments in the field of AM are expected in the future, especially in the coming years, given the possibility to increase the feasibility and reduce the costs, as well as the user-friendliness of the AM technologies. 5.
