With the new version of Photoshop, Adobe finally gave up on the idea that professional photographers need to keep their cameras connected to their computer in order to process images. The camera needs to be connected in order to make changes to the metadata in the RAW files. However, with Lightroom 5, the camera can now be disconnected indefinitely as long as the data has been backed up to your hard drive. Before you discard the camera though, check the camera settings to make sure all settings have been saved and you have connected the camera to your computer. A QuickTime player is included, and is a very old player at that. Microsoft users will recognize the old QuickTime Player. Because QuickTime has an external codec list, which Adobe can't ignore, users will most likely end up replacing QuickTime with the media layer from Adobe Media Encoder (there's also an external codec list for this). Relying on QuickTime for playback doesn't exactly scream "exceptional" to me. While a menu bar is provided, the menu itself is limited and only allows document properties, previous and next versions. That's not enough! I need to be able to edit font options, Image Size, Zoom Levels, and more in conjunction with my media layers. When it comes to editing current frames, the only way to do that is to have a layer for each camera position. That's not intuitive at the moment. There is no undo, redo, view previous/next, or any command of that sort whatsoever. You can't activate a layer and have it be exclusive. You can either have one or the other, but not both at the same time.
