The new 64-bit version of Photoshop has a better PDF export, too, letting you make PDF files with text and graphics, and to set up templates to produce PDFs for client files and ebooks. Adobe says it will update the program for the iPhone, too. Even though the iPad lacks the huge hard drive that makes PC versions of Photoshop a bummer, the program has been updated to include built-in Wi-Fi support and Dark Mode, to make for easier portability. With the previous version of Photoshop for iPad, you had to use Airplay, and while that worked OK, you couldn't do selective uploads and download. Adobe has addressed those problems in the latest version. Compatibility with other software usually takes precedence over speed always, despite all the hype about how fast our computers are. That being said, Lightroom users should be aware that they can now only work with 32-bit DNG files. If you had hoped for 64-bit support, you'll have to use Photoshop CS6 with one of the many third-party plugins and convert to 32-bit. If you create 32-bit DNG files with Lightroom, you will need to convert them to 64-bit DNG with a third-party converter. While the latter won't affect your Lightroom functionality, it will affect Power Windows users who don't have a 64-bit version. I suppose this only applies to Mac users if they plan on using Power Windows. And, in addition, 32-bit Photoshop will no longer create 32-bit PSD files either. The long awaited 64-bit support will come in the next major release of Photoshop.
