Lanthanide-assisted exchange and thermally-induced phase transitions in cytochrome c: a quantum chemical calculation. The role of lanthanide ions in the binding of cytochrome c (cyt c) with the paramagnetic iron center in horse heart cyt c has been studied by means of density functional theory calculations. A theoretical model of the Fermi-contact exchange interaction between the lanthanide and iron ions is based on a perturbative treatment of the one-electron Coulomb interaction. The results are discussed in the context of the proposed parallel-exchange-induced metalloprotein crystal field theory and the thermal denaturation theory. The present work shows that the thermal denaturation of horse heart cyt c from pH 6.8 to 8.5 is triggered by the collapse of the delocalized exchange interaction of the 3d electrons of the metal center with the unpaired electrons of the proteins. This collapse is achieved by the displacement of the metal ions from their positions in the regular structure of the protein. The collapsing transition is counteracted by the La<sup>3+</sup> ion that influences not only the ionic radii
