Also taking advantage of Windows 10's S Mode, Dark Mode now offers a more accurate look in any situation, giving you the option to switch between dark and light sight whenever you make a selection. I agree with your objection to the "all or nothing" approach towards PP. I much prefer the M6's "Camera Calibration" mode, but you can't use it in most Photoshop shots. I ended up using it as the "baseline" to adjust the D800's 16-bit LrMk5 settings and then "enabling" the PtlMk5 in the CmdLk5 editor. Hey guys,

When I do PP shots of my kids and family I'm impressed with their digital lifestyle where they are likely more interested in their own social media instead of a camera. I wonder if the rest of us are missing out on some valuable learning opportunities. A real-world experience is a multi-dimensional thing that you learn from in a much larger way than from viewing a still shot on a computer screen. I've slowed down my intake of "stuff" so that I can concentrate on experiences that give me something to write about. I would like to be in a position where I'm still doing some pix but I'm directing my attention and energy elsewhere.

I had read about this PP issue of owning the full version. I would love to read your thoughts on PP. Thanks and keep doing the super job you do,

Dave Thanks for the kind words. You're right, most of our info is about the people we know and the places we've been. Anyway, this is a natural progression. Think about it — what does Photoshop do? It exposes raw files, makes great-looking images, and lets photographers share these images from the places they've been. We have built-in analytics and a social media platform to help photographers make the most of their images. The next step for us is to get stronger in the social media side of things and to bring new types of information into the Photoshop ecosystem to help people make the most of the images they shoot. In fact, we've already made great progress in this area with the Story Map and Perspective tools in Photoshop. We're very excited about what we're doing and hope you are too. Thanks again for the kind words!
