Exploiting the hand: attractiveness of hand-shaped markers and its implications for display size and size-distance relationships. The main component of human face perception is the hand. In this article, we report two experiments in which the attractiveness of information about this part of the human body was investigated. Display size was varied, and distance between the viewer and the display was either constant or varied along with display size. The results show that the simultaneous presentation of the hand leads to higher attractiveness than the presentation of either hand alone, and that attractiveness is strongest when the two hands are presented at the same distance, but is strongest at larger
