Adobe Photoshop CC is the new version of Photoshop, and is more than a tweak to its predecessor. For 2012, Photoshop has a new responsive user interface — that is, a fresh, simply designed, easier-to-learn interface that you can use on any device without sacrificing the performance intended for a desktop computer. Photoshop CC will run, and look, well on tablets as much as it runs well on a 15" MacBook Pro. After a considerably lengthy slip-up, when Adobe released Photoshop CS5 to the public, it generated a lot of back-fires and bad blood from its developers, marketers and users. The best thing about using Photoshop is the ability to do almost any task, and the ease in which you can achieve excellent results. The worst thing about using Photoshop is the extra time and effort you need to invest to get the preferred results. A bad application, such as Photoshop, is an application that fails to meet user requirements.

Figure 1 illustrates the result of a photo retouched with Photoshop 6, Web Expert and Photoshop Express. Considering the enhanced stability of the latest version of Photoshop, the new Smart Sharpen tool tries to make your work easier. As the name implies, the tool can sharpen images -- but only if the image is up to the task, meaning you do not have to go through the full Photoshop editing process just to sharpen a picture. Given the countless free adware downloads that can be found on the Internet, most users are apprehensive to download the full version of Photoshop. However, even after the actual installation, some users may still be wary to download further viruses or even malware, even from a reputable source, as the same question may keep gnawing at them: Was it free? And will it harm them?

Adobe Photoshop, now a part of Adobe Creative Cloud, is not only an extremely capable image editor but also an invaluable tool for creating/marketing your very best content. It is a huge competitor for both Apple and Microsoft's own professional grade editors in usage and popularity. Photoshop also brings a new user experience to photo editing in the form of Photoshop Creative Cloud. You no longer have to think about scheduling new images or starting jobs. The interface is now based on a new AI-based workflow instead of the classic GIMP-inspired timeline that was in earlier versions. In addition, this change means you'll get the same tools in Photoshop as you do in the rest of Adobe's Creative Cloud tools, making it easier to edit and work faster. While the new Photoshop has some quirks, they're very minor; beyond a few tweaks compared to previous versions, the new interface is exactly how it was in 1996. Photoshop has also added Rapid Editions, a feature that automatically recognizes and eliminates colors in images you've been using to get professional quality results. There are a few things included with the Adobe Photoshop creative suite 2018, "one of which is the most important—everything is always open and always designed for PC. We've also worked to reduce the amount of Active Presets, memory, and CPU to make your Photoshop experience faster and more efficient." With Photoshop Creative Suite 2018, the number of frame-based tutorials is greater than ever. There are three—Reflections, Patterns, and Lens Distortion effects

The integration of a real-time color engine to the existing image editing features is significant. The result is a faster and more powerful tool that allows professionals to accomplish real-time editing in the tool itself while retaining the same hardware-independent benefits that the software has been known for since its inception. John Nack, CTO of Adobe, announced that "Photoshop will no longer generate files using the Apple ColorSync technology. As you know, since launch, Apple and Adobe have collaborated on a standard color profile file format called ColorSync. This has facilitated the sharing of color adjustments, and simplified color workflow across devices. However, since launch of Procreate 1.0, we have made significant advances in what can be done in Photoshop without relying on ColorSync." Since the announcement of this change the Adobe forum has been buzzing with excitement that Photoshop will no longer rely on ColorSync.
